Floating, But Also Freezing,

Those whose memory goes back nearly 40 years will not have forgotten the stir made by Captain Boyton, the inventor of a pneumatic lifesaving suit warranted to keep anyone afloat at sea. It was in connection with this device that James Creelman, the American journalist, who recently died in a Berlin hospital, gained his first opportunity. Captain Boyton arrived in New York in 1878 with his suit, and Mr. Creelman, then a junior reporter on the Herald, was instructed to test its qualities on behalf of that paper. Accordingly, one night Cappaper. Accordingly, one night Captain Boyton and Mr. Creelman donned their suits, jumped into the ice-filled bay at the Battery and floated down through the Narrows. The cold, however, was so intense that they had to be rescued. The journalist's story of this adventure was the first of many "scoops" he had to his credit.—Man-chester Guardian.

An Exception. If he will try often enough a man can succeed in doing almost anything unless he is trying to be original by conving somebody else.
